ADDENDA

At the close of World War II, new problems arose in the form of nuisance activity by "die-hard" SS troops, i.e., wire cutting, threats to civilians, petty theft, and the handling of displaced persons.

Troops continuing to resist in small groups have been hunted down with excellent help from civilian mountain guides; civilians in CIC roles have also been instrumental in apprehending SS personnel and leading Wazi politicians.

By the use of well-placed road blocks and bulletins, published in the language of those concerned, a vast improvement in holding control over the migration of displaced persons has been effected. Road blocks manned by alert guards have also netted numerous suspicious pe sons and SS troops.
